Accidental Inventions.

Gawalowski, in the Allgemeine Ingenieur Zeitung, has an interesting article on accidental inventions, in which he mentions first that the phonograph is due to an accident; Edison having related that one day when he sang in the mouthpiece of a telephone the vibration reckless fashion, caused the fine metal point of the dia-phragm to stick in his finger, which led him to produce the talking machine. This story is probably not at all new to American readers, but perhaps the history of some other inventions, which took their rise in Europe, may be. Natural indigo, which is among the dearest dyestuffs known and has been used since the twelfth century, at least, has been replaced very largely by the artificial product, which is due to accident. Sapper is said to have discovered it; but Cawalowski states that the invention has been falsely ascribed to Adolf von Baeyer (not to be confounded with Alex Bayer) and Hermann, al though Van Baeyer is always considered as having been the father of this most important discovery. Eosin also owes its existence to A. Von Baeyer, who was working at the time in the technical high school in Munchen, and discovered it by accident; in this matter Care having been of assistance. The Lauth violent and methylene blue were also products of accident, the first being produced by Lauth and the second by Caro, mentioned above; further, benzopurpurin is due to a laboratory assistant of Duishurg. Antipyrin and saccharin are also the children of accidental discovery; while in medicinal chemistry fluorescin and acctanilid (anti-febrin) were discovered by accident by one of the employes in the Hochst works .- Scientific American.

SHEEP FEEDING.

A Test of Various Rations In Fatton-

ing Range Lambs. A comparison of rations in the fattening of range lambs was made last winter by the Ohio experiment station

The lambs used were raised in Wyoming and were said to be from quarter blood Cotswold ewes and three quarter blood rams of the same breed All lots of lambs received the same amount of clover and alfalfa for roughage daily per lamb. Following is a sum mary of what seem to be the most important results of this test:

Lot 1, fed a grain ration of corn, made lower gains in live weight than did any of the other lots. When shipped to market they shrank less in weight than did any of the other lots. This lot led in dressed percentage. Lot 1 required more pounds of food to produce a pound of gain than did any of the other lots, but produced gains at less cost per pound than did any of the other lots save lot 4.

Lot 2, fed a grain ration of corn five parts, cottonseed meal one part, made higher gains than did any of the other lots save lot 4, shrank most during shipment to market and yielded the lowest total dressed weight and the lowest dressed percentage. The cost of gain was higher for lot 2 than for any other lot save lot 3.

Lot 3, fed a grain ration of corn five parts, linseed oil meal one part, made lower gains than did any of the other. lots save lot 1. This lot shrank more during shipment and yielded a lower dressed percentage than did any of the other lots save lot 2. The cost per pound gain was higher with lot 3 than with any of the other lots.

Lot 4, fed a grain ration of corn and a stock food, made slightly greater of the other lots. They shrank less in shipping and yielded a higher percent age of dressed weight than did any of the other lots save lot 1. One lamb died in this lot during the experiment.

The feeding of cottonseed meal and of linseed oil meal to lots 2 and 3 respectively increased the value of the manure produced by these lots. The extin cost of the rations, however, more than equaled the increased value of the manure.

Lots 3, 2 and 4, in the order mentioned, refused less roughage than did lot 1, indicating that the feeling of nitrogenous concentrates or of the stock food used has a tendency to increase the consumption of roughage.
